M: Good morning, everyone. Today I'm going to talk about a simple but effective skill to make your campus life more organized. As you may find, building good habits is often harder than breaking bad ones. Many of you may fail because you depend too much on motivation, which does not last long. However, some successful people use a useful way called "habit stacking", which means connecting a new habit you want to build with a previous one. The rule is easy: "After I finish my usual habit, I will try the new." For example, if you want to read more but have no time, you can read during your morning coffee routine. In time, the two activities will become one simple plan. "Habit stacking" works because our brains like easy patterns. It makes starting new actions easier. You do not need strong willpower, and you will not forget to do it. To make it work, remember to start very small. Do not try big changes at first. Then, be patient with yourself. If you miss a day, just get back on track. The goal is progress, not being perfect.
