Jamie's always been the risk-taker of the family. One of my strongest childhood memories is of him sitting on top of the school bike shelter, while our French teacher shouted at him to get down!

So, when he returned from Spain with a risky new hobby, I wasn't exactly surprised. He learned "Shepherd's Leap" (), where you use a long wooden pole to jump up and down mountains. It seemed super-dangerous at first. But as I learned more, my worry slowly turned into interest.

"Shepherd's Leap" has been practiced in the Canaries for centuries. Nowadays, it's less a working skill, but more a fun sport and an important part of local culture, celebrated in festivals and competitions across the islands.

When Jamie saw some local friends "leaping", he quickly realized it was worth learning. We live in Snowdonia, Wales — another rocky, hilly place! I must admit, he's becoming good at it. It's certainly a fun way to move about. In fact, while I'll never be as daring as my little brother, I'm considering trying it myself!
